Key Trade Associations and Member Organizations

Last Updated: March 16, 2023

Stakeholders expect transparency regarding companies’ public policy priorities, strategies, and activities. As set out in our Government Relations Policy, Walmart reports annually on these topics (see our Engagement in Public Policy ESG brief), including publishing a list of key trade association memberships and engagements (see below).

Trade Association and Coalition Governing Principles

Why we join and support trade associations and business coalitions: Walmart supports trade associations and coalitions where we believe the organization can assist us in achieving our long-term strategic objectives. Our support varies depending on the form of the organization (e.g., a 501(c)(6) vs. an ad hoc coalition), the breadth of the organization’s membership, the issues on which the organization focuses, the organization’s strategic importance to Walmart’s agenda, and other factors.

For example, Walmart is a traditional dues-paying member, has representatives on the organization’s governing board and has representatives deeply engaged in working committees of several large trade associations. In other instances, Walmart provides financial support for the organization and Walmart associates may participate in the organization’s activities, but Walmart has not taken a leadership position with the organization and does not engage the organization as a core part of its strategy. And in other cases, Walmart has provided financial support for specific initiatives housed within a broader organization.

Trade association involvement in matters of public policy: Some of these organizations engage in political activities, including political contributions and lobbying. Others help to shape the policy environment through public-facing advocacy. These organizations typically are not single-issue groups, rather they exist to serve the interests of their members across a wide spectrum of issues relevant to their membership. Accordingly, they must balance competing public policy interests and member interests when determining how to address matters of public policy.

Similarly, Walmart is not a single-issue organization. We support business organizations where we believe, on balance, that the benefits of membership will help us promote our objectives and strengthen the competitiveness and resilience of our business.

How we engage trade associations on matters of public policy: Walmart actively engages key trade associations to influence them on matters of public policy. We stay abreast of our major trade associations’ top policy priorities and engagements so that we can determine whether and how to engage to shape their perspectives and, where necessary, clarify ours. Additionally, we periodically review our memberships in trade associations and determine if any adjustments are needed in our membership status or the financial support we provide to the organization in light of the positions they take on matters of public policy. See our Engagement in Public Policy ESG brief for more information on this evaluation and engagement process.
